When we buy something, we give some form of money in exchange for the goods, resources or services. Every Country has its own system of coins and paper money. However, money as we know it is a recent origin. In the beginning people followed the barter system. That is people exchange one form of goods for another for example, a farmer would exchange a bag of rice for some clothes or a load of wood. But it is a complicated and tedious procedure because people could sometimes not agree about the worth of the exchange and at times did not want what the other person had to offer.

In order to solve this problem, human beings thought of a common medium of exchange, Some of the commodities used as money were salt, tea, tobacco, cattle and even slaves! Even this system was difficult as these were difficult to carry and store. It was then that people came up with the ideas of coins, something that was easy to store and was not perishable.

About 5000 B.C metal coins were introduced as money (gold coins) were introduced in the Western world by 700 B.C. the introduction of coins helped trade to flourish because it simplified transactions and made it possible to carry on trade over long distances. Soon, coins were also made of silver and other metals.

When the first paper money was introduced in China people did not take it very seriously. Kubali Khan, the mongol emperor who ruled China in the 13th century ordered that who refused to accept the new currency would be executed. He confiscated all the coins people possessed, even those carried by foreign visitors.

Today, we have different kinds of currency with different values in different countries. This makes transactions difficult as the money has to be converted into local currency. In order to avoid this 12 countries in Europe got together and in 2002, introduced a common currency called the Euro, which has replaced their national currencies.
